

ECB preview: Gut feeling vs model-based judgement

With the new tensions between hawks and doves, a 25bp rate cut at next week's meeting looks like a typical European compromise. However, a larger rate cut should not be excluded entirely

Source: Shutterstock

Somehow, we are back at where we were ahead of the European Central Bank's October meeting. The only difference this time around is not whether to cut or halt but rather whether to cut by 25bp or by 50bp. As ahead of the October meeting, there are good arguments for both options. At the October meeting, the ECB saw "risk management" as a key argument for the 25bp rate cut. The cut was a preemptive cut.

Since the October meeting, confidence indicators have weakened, while headline inflation has accelerated. Stagflationary tendencies are a very uncomfortable situation for the ECB. At the same time, negative risks have clearly increased. Think of the potential adverse effects from US economic policies over the coming months but also political instability in the two largest eurozone economies and now even a public finance crisis in France.

Downside risks have increased

The problem for the ECB is that these possible risks will not be reflected in the latest round of staff projections. Not only was the cut-off date of these forecasts before the latest political woes in France, the ECB normally also applies a “no policy change” assumption. With a pinch of irony, in the case of France, this assumption has received a completely new meaning. Anyhow, the ECB’s official staff projections will hardly show any changes from September. We could see a slight downward revision to growth and inflation in 2025 and probably unchanged forecasts for 2026. This alone would not be enough to alter the course of gradual rate cuts.

However, even if the official forecasts won’t provide big changes, the gut feeling of many ECB officials will be less benign and much more concerning. There is a high risk that on the back of Trump, France and Germany, eurozone growth will come in much weaker than the ECB’s projections will show. The only problem for the ECB to preemptively react to the current political woes is that it could be seen as intervening in national politics on the behalf of France. This is speculation the ECB would clearly rather avoid. The old comment from 2016 by then European Commission president Jean-Claude Juncker ‘because it’s France’ is an argument the ECB could not use, at least not publicly.

Gut feeling vs model-based judgement

The ECB’s rate cut in October was largely seen as a move to get ahead of the curve. Having been slow to address rising inflation and arguably late in stopping rate hikes last year, the ECB appeared determined to get ahead of the curve and return interest rates to neutral as quickly as possible. For the doves, this is a no-brainer, and for the hawks, the argument might be that getting rates back to neutral quickly could be enough to avoid another episode of unconventional monetary policy with quantitative easing and negative interest rates further down the line.

At next week’s meeting, a 50bp rate cut decision would nicely tie into the October motive of rate cuts as risk management and a strong signal that the ECB is seriously trying to get ahead of the curve. It would be a security move to preempt any potential risks for the eurozone economy coming from the next US administration’s potential economic policy choices and political woes in France and Germany. A 25bp rate cut decision would rather follow the cautious meeting-by-meeting approach, being a typical European compromise between doves and hawks.

We think that the ECB will be hesitant to really walk the walk on getting ahead of the curve and will cut rates by 25bp next week. To bring a bit more dovishness and to signal that the ECB is not getting cold feet in its quest to get ahead of the curve, we expect the ECB to communicate that it will continue bringing rates towards neutral levels and that it no longer rules out bringing rates into easing territory.

Eventually, it will all come down next week to the question whether the ECB will follow its gut feeling on everything that could happen over the coming months as a result of latest political developments or whether it sticks to the reality reflected in the staff projections, not taking into account all eventualities.

Author

Carsten Brzeski

Global Head of Macro

carsten.brzeski@ing.de

Disclaimer

This publication has been prepared by the Economic and Financial Analysis Division of ING Bank N.V. (“ING”) solely for information purposes without regard to any particular user’s investment objectives, financial situation, or means. ING forms part of ING Group (being for this purpose ING Group N.V. and its subsidiary and affiliated companies). The information in the publication is not an investment recommendation and it is not investment, legal or tax advice or an offer or solicitation to purchase or sell any financial instrument. Reasonable care has been taken to ensure that this publication is not untrue or misleading when published, but ING does not represent that it is accurate or complete. ING does not accept any liability for any direct, indirect or consequential loss arising from any use of this publication. Unless otherwise stated, any views, forecasts, or estimates are solely those of the author(s), as of the date of the publication and are subject to change without notice.

The distribution of this publication may be restricted by law or regulation in different jurisdictions and persons into whose possession this publication comes should inform themselves about, and observe, such restrictions.

Copyright and database rights protection exists in this report and it may not be reproduced, distributed or published by any person for any purpose without the prior express consent of ING. All rights are reserved. ING Bank N.V. is authorised by the Dutch Central Bank and supervised by the European Central Bank (ECB), the Dutch Central Bank (DNB) and the Dutch Authority for the Financial Markets (AFM). ING Bank N.V. is incorporated in the Netherlands (Trade Register no. 33031431 Amsterdam). In the United Kingdom this information is approved and/or communicated by ING Bank N.V., London Branch. ING Bank N.V., London Branch is authorised by the Prudential Regulation Authority and is subject to regulation by the Financial Conduct Authority and limited regulation by the Prudential Regulation Authority. ING Bank N.V., London branch is registered in England (Registration number BR000341) at 8-10 Moorgate, London EC2 6DA. For US Investors: Any person wishing to discuss this report or effect transactions in any security discussed herein should contact ING Financial Markets LLC, which is a member of the NYSE, FINRA and SIPC and part of ING, and which has accepted responsibility for the distribution of this report in the United States under applicable requirements.

Additional information is available on request. For more information about ING Group, please visit www.ing.com.