

Economics, actually: Our 2025 hit list

'Love, Actually' remains a firm festive film, but its themes and core message now appear dated and, at times, a little shocking. As Donald Trump prepares to re-enter the White House, Europe continues to struggle with stagnation, and conflict continues to rage, then I argue that, a bit like the movie, global economies really need to move on

Bill Nighy in the 2003 movie, Love Actually

Over the last five years, every single year has brought enough economic and political action you used to see in a decade. 2024 was no different. We had a record number of elections where we're seeing the rise of populism, central banks u-turned and slashed rates, and we economists were given a sharp reminder that there are, indeed, both cyclical and structural elements to growth.

We learnt a lot too. In China, the correction of a real estate bubble really does take years, not months. In the US, inflation can come down but costs can remain high. And those living costs can decide elections, not GDP growth or the speed of job creation. It's no longer 'the economy, stupid', but 'inflation, stupid'.

Here's another learning: it's all very well for central bankers to pat themselves on the back for managing a soft landing with rate hikes, but my goodness, we learnt that they're still far away from ordinary people's lives. And, hey, Europe! Did you forget that a gradual weakening of competitiveness will take its toll on the economy? I'm particularly looking at you, Germany.

The heady days of the Olympics, which apparently in the eurozone always tend to end with a public finance bang - first in Greece, now in France - seem an awfully long time ago. So, what do we have to look forward to next year?

It just so happens I was rewatching that Christmas favourite, 'Love, Actually', over the weekend. I know, I'm a softie at heart. And it started dawning on me that this sweet but now strangely dated movie classic may have more than one parallel with the economic world right now.

We have the old rockstar making an unexpected but stellar comeback. Will he still be filling the stadiums next year with his tariff song, or will he be holed up with his best mate in front of the TV?

There's Mark with his secret love for his best friend's wife. Might that be Europe on the doorstep of the White House next year, begging for some attention and pleading against a trade war?

Or perhaps Mr Trump himself, an unlikely Hugh Grant, will have to start a door-to-door search for his European partners as he realises that only a strong Transatlantic relationship can truly make America great again.

How about Europeans and Americans making great friendships like Colin Frissell did when he met those three American women? Or European consumers spending their way out of stagnation as Alan Rickman's Harry did when splurging on a necklace for his secretary?

'Love, Actually' is a movie of hope and unfulfilled wishes, of risk-taking but also complacency and, above all, a film of sometimes completely unrealistic stories. This is where it reflects our Macro Outlook for 2025. With our three calls, we present our safe bet, our riskier calls and some bolder ones, not unlike the movie.

But 'Love, Actually' is of its time; it hasn't aged too well. We're not likely to see this kind of old-genre romantic comedy in cinemas in 2025. Our global leaders, however, still seem intent on pushing onto us next year those same tried and tested themes with which we've become so familiar: tariffs, trade wars, isolationism, kicking the can...

I think we deserve better, actually.

Author

Carsten Brzeski

Global Head of Macro

carsten.brzeski@ing.de

Disclaimer

This publication has been prepared by the Economic and Financial Analysis Division of ING Bank N.V. ("ING") solely for information purposes without regard to any particular user's investment objectives, financial situation, or means. ING forms part of ING Group (being for this purpose ING Group N.V. and its subsidiary and affiliated companies). The information in the publication is not an investment recommendation and it is not investment, legal or tax advice or an offer or solicitation to purchase or sell any financial instrument. Reasonable care has been taken to ensure that this publication is not untrue or misleading when published, but ING does not represent that it is accurate or complete. ING does not accept any liability for any direct, indirect or consequential loss arising from any use of this publication. Unless otherwise stated, any views, forecasts, or estimates are solely those of the author(s), as of the date of the publication and are subject to change without notice.

The distribution of this publication may be restricted by law or regulation in different jurisdictions and persons into whose possession this publication comes should inform themselves about, and observe, such restrictions.

Copyright and database rights protection exists in this report and it may not be reproduced, distributed or published by any person for any purpose without the prior express consent of ING. All rights are reserved. ING Bank N.V. is authorised by the Dutch Central Bank and supervised by the European Central Bank (ECB), the Dutch Central Bank (DNB) and the Dutch Authority for the Financial Markets (AFM). ING Bank N.V. is incorporated in the Netherlands (Trade Register no. 33031431 Amsterdam). In the United Kingdom this information is approved and/or communicated by ING Bank N.V., London Branch. ING Bank N.V., London Branch is authorised by the Prudential Regulation Authority and is subject to regulation by the Financial Conduct Authority and limited regulation by the Prudential Regulation Authority. ING Bank N.V., London branch is registered in England (Registration number BR000341) at 8-10 Moorgate, London EC2 6DA. For US Investors: Any person wishing to discuss this report or effect transactions in any security discussed herein should contact ING Financial Markets LLC, which is a member of the NYSE, FINRA and SIPC and part of ING, and which has accepted responsibility for the distribution of this report in the United States under applicable requirements.

Additional information is available on request. For more information about ING Group, please visit www.ing.com.