

Watch: How Europe is getting its act together over Covid-19

After criticism that it wasn't doing enough, European leaders are finally pushing through measures to mitigate the worst economic aspects of the current coronavirus crisis

Why Europe may finally be getting its act together over Covid-19

It looks as if Europe is finally getting its act together over the coronavirus crisis. ING's Carsten Brzeski says we've seen four remarkable events over the last few weeks, not least the proposal for the European recovery fund, backed by both France and Germany. We also finally have a pan-European fiscal response and German action here, says Carsten, is remarkable. All this combined could lead to more solidarity and integration in the eurozone.
