

Complacency is a real danger for Europe's economies

The eurozone's economies are looking in pretty good shape - at least on the face of it. But leaders must be aware that complacency is far from the only challenge they're facing. Watch our short video and download our latest flagship report below.

Complacency is a real danger for Europe's economy

The eurozone's economy starts the year in pretty decent shape. There's vaguely decent growth, and inflation is bang on target. No wonder the European Central Bank keeps referring to being in a "good place". But ING's Bert Colijn says there's a real danger here. As other countries flex their economic muscles, Europe has to commit to higher defence spending, invest in high-tech, and pursue further reforms. If it doesn't, 2026 could be a year of reckoning.

Europe's sweet economic music is about to be drowned out: our full report

Most eurozone economies look to be in pretty good shape. But while leaders appear to be waltzing through a genteel tea dance, the rest of the world is thrashing to a heavy metal beat. Time to change the tune, perhaps. Download our full PDF report below
