Asia week ahead: Inflation reports in focus next week

Next week's data calendar focuses on inflation reports from several economies

Given strict social distancing measures in China, more cities could find themselves being put into lockdown

Inflation could show early fallout from ongoing Russia-Ukraine conflict

In the coming week, inflation data from Korea, Japan and Singapore will be released. Although this data covers February, we could see the initial impact of the ongoing conflict in eastern Europe, which began at the end of last month. Korea producer price index (PPI) and Tokyo consumer price index (CPI) inflation will move up further, but both will remain significantly lower than the global and regional trends. In Singapore, inflation will likely accelerate further from January's 4% pace given supply chain bottlenecks and rising commodity prices. In the months ahead we will likely see core inflation crest 3%, which could prod more aggressive action from the Monetary Authority of Singapore (MAS).

No adjustments from PBoC but accommodation still possible this year

As the People's Bank of China (PBoC) didn't cut the Medium Lending Facility following decent growth in activity data announced on 15 March, we expect 1Y and 5Y Loan Prime Rates will also stay the same. But this does not imply that the PBoC will not loosen monetary policy over the rest of the year. Covid is the main concern now. Given strict social distancing measures, it is likely that more cities could find themselves being put under “semi-lockdown”. We expect the central bank to respond with targeted RRR cuts aimed at supporting small and medium-sized enterprises.

Manufacturing activity

Manufacturing reports are also scheduled in the coming week. Taiwan’s export orders and industrial production should both show growth driven by demand for semiconductors. Japan’s Jibun Bank Manufacturing purchasing managers' index (PMI) is expected to record a second monthly drop but should stay above the neutral level of 50. Lastly, Singapore releases data on manufacturing output, which should show a contraction, tracking the disappointing PMI and non-oil domestic exports (NODX) reports for the same month.

Key events in EMEA next week

Rate hikes in Hungary and GDP releases in Mexico and Croatia dominate next week's EMEA calendar

The National Bank of Hungary in Budapest

✓ Hungary: Rising inflation evokes hawkish responses from the National Bank

The National Bank of Hungary will put more emphasis on the pro-inflationary impact of the war than on the negative economic activity impact when it meets again next week. This will be reflected in the new staff projection as we see significant upward revisions in the 2022-23 inflation outlook. Against this backdrop, we see a hawkish 100bp hike in the base rate and in the interest rate corridor on Tuesday followed by a 50bp rise in the 1-week deposit rate on Thursday.

As an alternative scenario – especially if the Hungarian forint (HUF) strengthens further – the combination of a 50bp (base rate) and a 30bp (1-week deposit rate) hike would be realistic as well. To end the week, we are going to see the latest unemployment data, where we expect some positive correction in February after the seasonal uptick in the jobless rate in January.

The Fed raised rates by 75bp

✓ US: Further hawkish signals from the Federal Reserve following last week's rate hike

The Federal Reserve has signalled a much stronger appetite to combat the threat of inflation. It is now signalling a further 150bp of interest rate increases after this week's 25bp hike having told us just 12 months ago that it didn't think it would need to raise rates before 2024. The world has changed so we will be focusing on the numerous Fed speakers scheduled over the coming week to see how they view the balance of risks. We will also be listening out for any comments on potential plans they have for running down the central bank's $8.9tr balance sheet. Data includes durable goods orders, which will be dragged lower by a drop in Boeing aircraft orders. Strip these out and the report should be solid given evidence seen in business surveys, such as the ISM report. There are also plenty of housing data, which should be OK.
