

Bank of England survey raises hope of lower inflation

The Bank of England survey of corporate pricing plans contains good news, but June's 50 basis-point rate hike shows that policymakers are losing patience and confidence in these forward-looking inflation indicators. Expect at least two more 25bp hikes, but better news on inflation should allow a pause later this year

The Bank of England in London

Some good news on inflation for once

If you're looking for some good news on the UK inflation story, then on the face of it there's plenty of it in the latest Decision Maker Panel from the Bank of England. This survey, which historically policymakers have paid close attention to, asks chief financial officers (CFOs) a variety of questions about their expectations. And for several months now, it has pointed to more muted price pressure from the corporate sector. Here are a few of the stand-out figures:

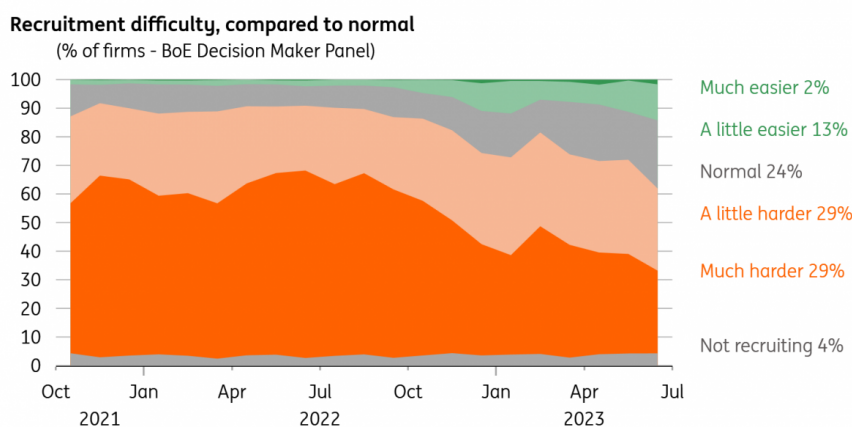

- Expected price growth over the next year is 4.9%, down from a peak of 6.6% a year ago (and 5.9% in April).
- Wage growth is seen at 5.3% over the next year, having peaked at 6.3% in December.
- The proportion of firms finding it "much harder" to recruit compared to normal is at 29%, comfortably the lowest it has been since the question was introduced in October 2021. It was typically between 50-60% through much of 2021/22.

- One-year ahead CPI expectations are at 5.7%, down from a peak of 9.5% seen last September, though three-year expectations nudged up slightly.

All of this echoes what we've seen in some of the other leading indicators of inflation, including producer price inflation which has come down dramatically over recent months. The doves at the Bank of England would argue that all of this suggests inflation should come down dramatically later this year, and the recent stickiness is simply a longer-than-expected lag time from lower input price inflation.

Recruitment difficulties are easing

Source: Bank of England Decision Maker Panel, Macrobond

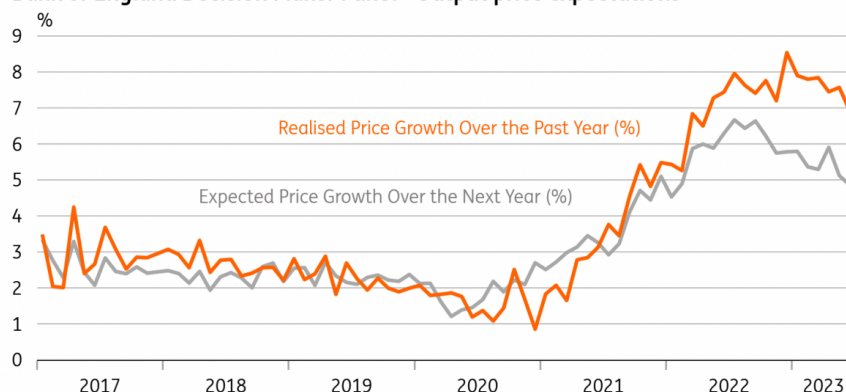

The BoE is losing confidence in these surveys

But June's decision to lift rates by 50 basis points, having been hiking more gradually over recent months, showed that the wider BoE committee is losing patience and confidence in these forward-looking measures. The hawks would point to the survey question on "price growth", which shows firms consistently predicting inflation to be lower than what is actually realised, as the chart below demonstrates. The Bank has also produced interesting research showing that firms are resetting prices more regularly than in the past, which the hawks could argue shows that inflation is more ingrained than it once was.

The reality is that the Bank is likely to pay less attention than usual to these surveys, and we think the next few policy decisions will be guided by CPI inflation, and to some extent average earnings, and not a lot else. We'll get fresh data on the latter next week, and it looks like regular pay growth (which excluded volatile bonuses) will stay either flat or a touch lower on a year-on-year basis. The key question is whether the recent re-acceleration in pay growth is largely a function of the higher National Living Wage, or whether it reflects renewed underlying momentum in wage setting.

Realised price growth has typically been higher than what firms had expected

Bank of England Decision Maker Panel - Output price expectations

Source: Bank of England Decision Maker Panel

When it comes to CPI, we expect to see the headline rate dip to 8% in June's numbers from 8.7% currently, and down again to 6.5-7% in July. But that's mainly a function of lower electricity/gas prices and a reflection of the sharp rise in petrol prices we saw at the same time last year. We'd expect services inflation to notch slightly lower over the summer, but probably not enough to prompt another change in strategy among committee members.

We therefore expect a 25 basis point rate hike in August and another in September – and we certainly wouldn't rule out more. But ultimately we think the surveys, including the Decision Maker Panel, do contain some useful signals. And by November, we think the committee will have more confidence that inflation is indeed easing, to enable it to pause its rate hike cycle.

Read more in our latest ING monthly.

Author

James Smith

Developed Markets Economist, UK

james.smith@ing.com

Disclaimer

This publication has been prepared by the Economic and Financial Analysis Division of ING Bank N.V. ("ING") solely for information purposes without regard to any particular user's investment objectives, financial situation, or means. ING forms part of ING Group (being for this purpose ING Group N.V. and its subsidiary and affiliated companies). The information in the publication is not an investment recommendation and it is not investment, legal or tax advice or an offer or solicitation to purchase or sell any financial instrument. Reasonable care has been taken to ensure that this publication is not untrue or misleading when published, but ING does not represent that it is accurate or complete. ING does not accept any liability for any direct, indirect or consequential loss arising from any use of this publication. Unless otherwise stated, any views, forecasts, or estimates are solely those of the author(s), as of the date of the publication and are subject to change without notice.

The distribution of this publication may be restricted by law or regulation in different jurisdictions and persons into whose possession this publication comes should inform themselves about, and observe, such restrictions.

Copyright and database rights protection exists in this report and it may not be reproduced, distributed or published by any person for any purpose without the prior express consent of ING. All rights are reserved. ING Bank N.V. is authorised by the Dutch Central Bank and supervised by the European Central Bank (ECB), the Dutch Central Bank (DNB) and the Dutch Authority for the Financial Markets (AFM). ING Bank N.V. is incorporated in the Netherlands (Trade Register no. 33031431 Amsterdam). In the United Kingdom this information is approved and/or communicated by ING Bank N.V., London Branch. ING Bank N.V., London Branch is authorised by the Prudential Regulation Authority and is subject to regulation by the Financial Conduct Authority and limited regulation by the Prudential Regulation Authority. ING Bank N.V., London branch is registered in England (Registration number BR000341) at 8-10 Moorgate, London EC2 6DA. For US Investors: Any person wishing to discuss this report or effect transactions in any security discussed herein should contact ING Financial Markets LLC, which is a member of the NYSE, FINRA and SIPC and part of ING, and which has accepted responsibility for the distribution of this report in the United States under applicable requirements.

Additional information is available on request. For more information about ING Group, please visit www.ing.com.