

Germany: Running out of superlatives

The German economy has provided further evidence that it can continue to boom despite the political impasse in Berlin

Source: iStockphoto

Germany's most prominent leading indicator, the Ifo index, started the year with an all-time high, sending a strong signal that the current political impasse in Berlin has no impact on the economy at all. In January, the Ifo index rebounded to 117.6, from 117.2 in December, and equalled the November all-time high. The current assessment component continued its recent surge and increased to another all-time high. At the same time, the expectations component dropped somewhat; not surprising given the extremely high level of the current assessment.

Consumer confidence also strong

Earlier this morning, German consumer confidence hit the highest level since 2001, on the back of buoyant economic growth and high personal income expectations. The willingness to buy is back at its mid-2015 level. Interestingly, consumers' price expectations remain low.

Strong, stronger, German economy?

At the beginning of the new year, it's all hunky-dory in the German economy. It looks as if an already mature cycle is getting longer and longer. At least in the first months of the year, the economy should maintain its strong momentum. In fact, the German economy still has some upward potential as the output gap is positive but not extraordinary high, capacity utilisation is above its historical average but still lower than in 2007 and investments have only started to increase this year. The big question in the course of 2018 will be whether less monetary policy accommodation – on the back of a stronger euro and higher long-term interest rates – can be offset by the recent upswing of the Eurozone economy and the general strength of the global economy.

Longer term challenges

Looking beyond the near to mid-term outlook, the biggest challenge or risk for the German economy could come from the US tax overhaul and a shift away from ‘together’ towards ‘against one another’ at the global economic level, as well as geopolitical risks. In this regard, new structural reforms and new private and public investments are needed to safeguard the currently strong domestic momentum of the German economy. This is both good and bad news: while the ongoing boom clearly shows that the political impasse in Berlin has had no tangible impact on the economy (yet), politics will matter; eventually.

Author

Carsten Brzeski

Global Head of Macro

carsten.brzeski@ing.de

Disclaimer

This publication has been prepared by the Economic and Financial Analysis Division of ING Bank N.V. (“ING”) solely for information purposes without regard to any particular user's investment objectives, financial situation, or means. ING forms part of ING Group (being for this purpose ING Group N.V. and its subsidiary and affiliated companies). The information in the publication is not an investment recommendation and it is not investment, legal or tax advice or an offer or solicitation to purchase or sell any financial instrument. Reasonable care has been taken to ensure that this publication is not untrue or misleading when published, but ING does not represent that it is accurate or complete. ING does not accept any liability for any direct, indirect or consequential loss arising from any use of this publication. Unless otherwise stated, any views, forecasts, or estimates are solely those of the author(s), as of the date of the publication and are subject to change without notice.

The distribution of this publication may be restricted by law or regulation in different jurisdictions and persons into whose possession this publication comes should inform themselves about, and observe, such restrictions.

Copyright and database rights protection exists in this report and it may not be reproduced, distributed or published by any person for any purpose without the prior express consent of ING. All rights are reserved. ING Bank N.V. is authorised by the Dutch Central Bank and supervised by the European Central Bank (ECB), the Dutch Central Bank (DNB) and the Dutch Authority for the Financial Markets (AFM). ING Bank N.V. is incorporated in the Netherlands (Trade Register no. 33031431 Amsterdam). In the United Kingdom this information is approved and/or communicated by ING Bank N.V., London Branch. ING Bank N.V., London Branch is authorised by the Prudential Regulation Authority and is subject to regulation by the Financial Conduct Authority and limited regulation by the Prudential Regulation Authority. ING Bank N.V., London branch is registered in England (Registration number BR000341) at 8-10 Moorgate, London EC2 6DA. For US Investors: Any person wishing to discuss this report or effect transactions in any security discussed herein should contact ING Financial Markets LLC, which is a member of the NYSE, FINRA and SIPC and part of ING, and which has accepted responsibility for the distribution of this report in the United States under applicable requirements.

Additional information is available on request. For more information about ING Group, please visit <http://www.ing.com>.