

Lower UK inflation unlikely to faze Bank of England

UK inflation is set to fall over the next few months on lower household energy costs. Barring a more significant decline in economic activity, we think the Bank of England will 'look through' lower CPI and keep rates on hold this year

Source: Shutterstock

Higher petrol prices lifted UK inflation in January, but this is unlikely to last. We expect headline CPI to fall from the latest figure of 1.8% to around 1.1/1.2% by June, as falls in household energy costs trickle through. Sharp cuts to water bills, as well as a lower regulated energy cap, should become a fairly noticeable drag on inflation.

Of course, none of this will come as much of a surprise to the Bank of England, which is more concerned about the fairly muted level of core services inflation. This is one of the better measures of what policymakers call “domestically-generated inflation”, and with wage growth having risen over the past couple of years, core services CPI would have been expected to rise in tandem.

We think a rate cut looks fairly unlikely for the time being

But this hasn't really happened, which suggests margins have become compressed. Will this change now that optimism is rising again after the election? Part of the answer depends on whether firms feel they have greater pricing power to pass on these higher wage costs to shoppers. Despite some early signs that consumer confidence recovered a little after the election in December, we suspect competitive pressures and ongoing lack of demand in some retail segments will still make it challenging for retailers to lift prices more quickly.

At the same time, skill shortages in various industries (notably construction and hospitality) are unlikely to fade, and this will continue to maintain structural upward pressure on wage growth in some sectors.

This is one story the Bank of England is likely to keep a close eye on at its next few meetings, but even so, we think a rate cut looks fairly unlikely for the time being. Policymakers will be looking for signs that rising business sentiment is translating into faster economic growth, although we think it would take a material deterioration in the economic backdrop for them to ease policy in the near-term.

Author

James Smith

Developed Markets Economist, UK

james.smith@ing.com

Disclaimer

This publication has been prepared by the Economic and Financial Analysis Division of ING Bank N.V. ("ING") solely for information purposes without regard to any particular user's investment objectives, financial situation, or means. ING forms part of ING Group (being for this purpose ING Group N.V. and its subsidiary and affiliated companies). The information in the publication is not an investment recommendation and it is not investment, legal or tax advice or an offer or solicitation to purchase or sell any financial instrument. Reasonable care has been taken to ensure that this publication is not untrue or misleading when published, but ING does not represent that it is accurate or complete. ING does not accept any liability for any direct, indirect or consequential loss arising from any use of this publication. Unless otherwise stated, any views, forecasts, or estimates are solely those of the author(s), as of the date of the publication and are subject to change without notice.

The distribution of this publication may be restricted by law or regulation in different jurisdictions and persons into whose possession this publication comes should inform themselves about, and observe, such restrictions.

Copyright and database rights protection exists in this report and it may not be reproduced, distributed or published by any person for any purpose without the prior express consent of ING. All rights are reserved. ING Bank N.V. is authorised by the Dutch Central Bank and supervised by the European Central Bank (ECB), the Dutch Central Bank (DNB) and the Dutch Authority for the Financial Markets (AFM). ING Bank N.V. is incorporated in the Netherlands (Trade Register no. 33031431 Amsterdam). In the United Kingdom this information is approved and/or communicated by ING Bank N.V., London Branch. ING Bank N.V., London Branch is authorised by the Prudential Regulation Authority and is subject to regulation by the Financial Conduct Authority and limited regulation by the Prudential Regulation Authority. ING Bank N.V., London branch is registered in England (Registration number BR000341) at 8-10 Moorgate, London EC2 6DA. For US Investors: Any person wishing to discuss this report or effect transactions in any security discussed herein should contact ING Financial Markets LLC, which is a member of the NYSE, FINRA and SIPC and part of ING, and which has accepted responsibility for the distribution of this report in the United States under applicable requirements.

Additional information is available on request. For more information about ING Group, please visit www.ing.com.